

You Better Watch Out...

Santa Claus is Coming to the Internet!

Remember that old Christmas Magic you used to feel?

Capture that childlike wonder all over again! Today's kids can get a visit with Santa from the comfort of home... right at their computer desktop!

VISIT
JINGLEGRAM
.COM
TODAY!

SEND YOUR
JINGLEGRAM™
GREETING TO THAT SPECIAL
PERSON IN YOUR LIFE,
RIGHT NOW!

Santa Claus Ticketed for Speeding... on the Information Superhighway

What began as a typical Friday night of worldwide websurfing, chatroom trolling, Blog updating and generally tame cybertravel ended in an odd but revealing encounter with a strange bearded man referred to only as "Santa Claus."

At approximately 10:38pm, a troupe of Cyber Police stationed at the E-Traffic Control Headquarters were munching donuts and making their nightly rounds at various data interchanges when they spied a bizarre red light registering on their Tracer Equipment. After prying their trainee away from his Sims game, polishing off one last chocolate glazed and fumbling around trying to locate their iPods, they finally decided to get down to business. Using advanced cyber technology, they tracked the mysterious red line of light as it orbited the earth six times at an unheard-of speed, engaged in a frantic tic-tac-tapping pattern from Africa to Canada and back several times in succession, and then swooped back up to Greenland where it hovered for a few seconds until it made its final stop at the Polar Ice Cap.

"I thought for sure it was aliens," reports Cyber Patrol Officer Jim Wickland. "My buddy Rick said he thought it was possibly Santa Claus, but since he had his mouth full of Krispy Kremes at the time I figured I'd just heard him wrong."

Upon further investigation, the Cyber Patrol Troup determined it WAS in fact Santa Claus, that elusive sleigh jockey from back-in-the-day; and the "eerie red glow" was coming from none other than Rudolph's nose as he led his pack of antler-laden sleigh-pullers around and around the planet at breakneck cyberspeeds.

"This is so much better than trying to compete with all those planes!" a sweat-bearded Santa uttered breathlessly as he plucked icicles from his whiskers. "You don't know what it is like to be stuck in air traffic gridlock with thousands of 747s season after season!"

Upon further questioning, it was revealed that Santa Claus had been taking what some might call his first "joy ride" down the Information Superhighway in celebration of his having recently acquired internet access at the North Pole. "I know; it was a long time coming but we're always the last priority. I only got digital cable last month!"

Santa went on to reveal big plans in the works now that he's "connected." "I'm taking Christmas to a whole new level!" he stated emphatically. In a possible effort to weasel his way out of a cyber speeding ticket, Santa then boldly presented his idea to host his Santa Visits via the net using webstreaming video technology. "Not only does sleigh-cruising the cyber-highway totally rock, but I also plan to take full advantage of this instant connection I'll have with all the world's children." He mentioned linking up with a group of elves called Dream Big Media who will handle all the "dirty work" while he polishes his Big Screen persona. "What can I say, I owe it all to the little people," was his final giddy remark.

Santa was urged to plea-bargain his web traffic violation on an undisclosed court date, and anonymous sources speculate that the local prosecutor may in fact try to finagle an extra gift or two in his stocking this year before he can knock the charges down from Reckless Websurfing to, say, Failure to Signal which would unfortunately bring Rudolph under further scrutiny. Despite these developments, Santa was in merry spirits as he headed for home that evening.

For more information regarding Santa Claus's Internet Connection and what it can do for you, visit www.Jinglegram.com.

Are YOU ready to JINGLE???